

Acknowledgments

I wish to express my gratitude and appreciation for the strong support I had from the Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD) to conduct such a wide-ranging review. Although no one in that office is responsible for the results of this decidedly unofficial analysis, none of it would have been possible without the staunch support of so many career and appointed officials under the leadership of Secretary of Defense Robert Gates. It is no surprise that one should turn first to OSD when casting about to discover where in the U.S. Government one can find a large cadre of professionals with an exemplary art of deliberate practice and thus high standards and well-crafted planning processes. I salute all of them for their public service and apologize for the shortcomings of this study.

Next, I wish to thank all the authors who have contributed to this volume. Even a quick perusal of the table of contents should underscore the wealth of analysis tapped for this ambitious project; it contains the names of the more than 125 contributors and the leaders of each of 20 chapters. Many of the authors are internationally renowned, including Joseph Nye, Paul Collier, John Esposito, David Kilcullen, and the late Sir Michael Quinlan. Others have since joined the Obama administration in senior positions, including Dennis Blair as the Director of National Intelligence, Michèle Flournoy as Under Secretary of Defense for Policy, Robert Work as Under Secretary of the Navy, and Carlos Pascual as Ambassador to Mexico. Some are serving or former senior military officers, including Admiral James Stavridis, USN, now North Atlantic Treaty Organization Supreme Allied Commander Europe, and former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff General Richard Myers, USAF (Ret.). Some of the authors served in senior positions during the previous administration of George W. Bush, including former U.S. Agency for International Development Administrator Andrew Natsios and former Under Secretary of State Marc Grossman. Several of the authors have since taken new assignments within the Department of Defense, including two of my outstanding former colleagues in the Institute for National Strategic Studies (INSS), James Schear and Joseph McMillan, as well as author Janine Davidson. As a group and to a person, they rose to the occasion, exceeded every expectation, and have performed brilliantly in their writing, analysis, and insights. They are not the only world-class experts on these issues, but they are among the best. They deserve the lion's share of the credit for this study, and I alone take responsibility for any problems or errors that remain in this document.

Third, it is with sincere and profound fondness and respect that I applaud the contributions of the INSS Senior Fellows, all of whom have been pressed into service, and who met every challenge and deadline with skill and equanimity. They remain the nucleus of the INSS think tank, with a potent capacity for thinking strategically while maintaining great depth in their respective areas of specialization. At the same time, various authors from other parts of the diverse set of components comprising the National Defense University also made great contributions, and I thank all of them, too.

Fourth, I wish to acknowledge David H. Gurney, and the tremendous efforts of the able and hard-working staff of NDU Press who played a key role in the various stages of this volume's preparation. It would not be possible to overstate the importance to the project of their meticulous attention to detail and schedules, or of their professional care of logic, grammar, graphics, and composition. I owe a special debt of thanks to Martin "Jimmy" Peters for his incredible devotion to the production of this volume. To them I should add a special mention of thanks to lead designer Christopher Dunham, the staff, and management of Creative Services at the Government Printing Office, which played a critical role in the production of this study.

Fifth, I wish to acknowledge the outstanding assistance of my personal staff, from Kimberley Berlin, who put in tireless hours in the final stretches to help make this publication widely available, to Michelle Germany, who helped to keep me on track, and to interns Zain Shad and John-Michael Arnold.

Finally, I am indebted to my two project managers who oversaw every aspect of this massive “cat-herding” challenge: Colonel Chris Goggins, USAF, whose retirement in the fall of 2008 created a gap that could only have been filled by retired Naval officer Paul Giarra, who is a consummate scholar-strategist. They became the single points of contact trying to keep up with my unrelenting and wide-ranging demands, and words cannot fully express my appreciation for their dedication and patience. To you, and to all others whom I have neglected to mention, thank you for making this book possible.
