

THE AMERICAN FRONTIERS IN THE SIXTIES

Final
3/21/61

What will be the American Frontiers in the Sixties? Like our historic frontier in the early decades of the republic, they will be places of dangerous opportunities, thresholds of forward progress in every sector of our international and domestic life. They will be dangerous because they are areas of contact with divergent and often opposing forces which must be overcome before the opportunities of the frontier may be realized. The opportunities are there by the very fact of the exposure of location -- the prizes of the New World ^{all} fall to men of the frontier just as ^{frontiers} soldiers have always won the laurels of the battle.

Specifically, where will we look for the frontiers of the 1960's? I would say in the entire field of our international and perhaps interspatial relations and most certainly in the sectors of our domestic life related to the social relations of our citizens, their economic activities, and their intellectual and spiritual development. Each segment of that frontier is a study in itself, requiring a painstaking analysis of possibilities, dangers, assets and liabilities. Along each portion of the front there are objectives to be established and plans of campaign to be designed for their attainment. The dangers to be faced are those arising from war, injustice, disorder and decadence. But the opportunities are as rich as the dangers are grim: the opportunity for the restraint of war, the flowering of culture, increased knowledge of the physical world, the creative use of leisure and the growth of social justice.

These frontiers can be won and extended only if manned by the best of American men and women who feel deeply the importance of the post and understand the Great Challenge.

THE AMERICAN FRONTIERS IN THE SIXTIES

What will be the American Frontiers in the Sixties? Like our historic frontier in the early decades of the republic, they will be places of dangerous opportunities, thresholds of forward progress in every sector of our international and domestic life. They will be dangerous because they are areas of contact with divergent and often opposing forces which must be overcome before the opportunities of the frontier may be realized. The opportunities are there by the very fact of the exposure of location -- they were the adventurous frontiersmen who won the prizes of the New World. It is on the front line of battle that the laurel is found.

More specifically, where will we look for the frontiers of the 1960's? I would say in the entire field of our international and perhaps interspatial relations and most certainly in the sectors of our domestic life related to the social relations of our citizens, their economic activities, and their intellectual and spiritual development. Each segment of that frontier is a study in itself, requiring a painstaking analysis of possibilities, dangers, assets and liabilities. Along each front line there are objectives to be established and plans of campaign to be designed for their attainment. In the aggregate, the dangers to be faced are those arising from war, revolution, injustice and decadence. But the opportunities are as rich as the dangers are grim: the opportunity for the restraint of war, the flowering of culture, increased knowledge of the physical world, the creative use of leisure and the growth of social justice.

These frontiers can be won and extended only if manned by the best of American men and women who feel deeply the importance of the post and understand the Great Challenge.
