Tyler Rauert joined the Near East South Asia Center for Strategic Studies at the National Defense University in May of 2005. He focuses on the study of terrorism, the law of armed conflict, and security in the Middle East and South Asia. Professor Rauert is responsible for issues of combating terrorism and international law. His most recent published works can be found in the Gulf Yearbook 2006-2007 and the Journal of International Security Affairs.

Prior to joining the NESAC Center, Mr. Rauert was a consultant on the use of force in international law to the Potomac Institute for Policy Studies. His work there focused primarily on the application of the law of armed conflict to pioneering military and intelligence techniques and, derivatively, on international pathologies such as terrorism, drug and human trafficking, democide, and aggressive war. Mr. Rauert previously served as the Research Coordinator for the International Center for Terrorism Studies, where he facilitated the research and compilation of several projects related to terrorism and political violence. These endeavors included studies of international terrorist networks, U.S. counterterrorism policy, international cooperation in combating terrorism, counterterrorism strategy, and profiles of terrorist groups.

Mr. Rauert earned his J.D. from American University's Washington College of Law and his Master's degree in International Affairs from American University's School of International Service. He also completed a terrorism studies research program with the Inter-University Center for Legal Studies at the International Law Institute after receiving a Bachelor's degree in political science from Truman State University. He is a member of the American Society of International Law, the American Bar Association, and the District of Columbia Bar.
